“ My Dad was a selfless, hard-working person when it came to providing for his family. He truly loved spending time with family and friends, as everyone enjoyed spending time with him. He was a very opinionated person with a somewhat antiquated point of view, but didn't let that stop him from being able to get along with everyone. He loved to talk (and talk and talk...) and loved to laugh and try to get everyone else to do the same. Some might say he had a very unique (twisted) sense of humor, which is probably the greatest inheritance he left me with. Surprisingly, he could be fairly negative about life in general, which is where I had the most head-butting with him. He was deeply rooted in the past, missing the people who were gone and always felt the "old days" were a much happier time. I tried to get him to see that the here and now, as well as future times, were just as important, if not more so, because the past was nothing more than the foundation of the future and that the future was his legacy. Nonetheless, I couldn't imagine not having him as my father, my Dad. He had a major impact on my life. The positives of course, but even more so the negatives have made me want to be a different, better person. I will always be grateful to my Dad for everything he provided and passed along to me. After his passing, the world has continued turning and life has kept going on, but it has just been a bit emptier without him. I miss talking with him and making each other laugh, which was almost always. Sometimes over the stupidest, most ridiculous things. I definitely have not laughed as much since he's been gone. He would continue to be proud of his family, his legacy. I love you Dad, and miss you more than could be imagined. I will do my best to make you proud and will always keep you in my heart and will do my best to take care of our family.
